Michael Campbell

New Zealand's parliament had suspended its session to watch their fellow countryman write history. Michael Campbell astonished the golfing world by defeating the greatest golfer of all time, Tiger Woods, at historic Pinehurst No. 2 golf course on the final day in the 2005 US Open.

Michael Campbell had arrived in North Carolina ranked 80th. The Chicago Tribune dismissively lumped him with a bunch of no-hopers as "a guy who was born in New Zealand into a Maori tribe ... who has missed the US Open cut four years in a row". The latter was actually true ...

Michael is a native Maori and descendent of New Zealand's first Scottish settlers. He began playing golf at the tender age of 7. As from 1988, he represented New Zealand in international amateur competitions. Cambo (as he is known) quickly established himself on the European Tour after three Challenge Tour wins in 1994. He won the Alfred Dunhill Masters in 1995 and the Johnnie Walker Classic in 1999. In 2000 he finished fourth on the European Tour Order of Merit and won the PGA Tour of Australasia's Order of Merit with wins at the New Zealand Open, Ericsson Masters and the Heineken Classic. He defended his Heineken Classic trophy in 2001 and again finished in the top ten on the European Tour Order of Merit in 2002.

Michael missed five cuts in early 2005 before swing changes made under the tutelage of Jonathan Yarwood started nestling in. In 2005, besides becoming a most unexpected US Open champion, he also won the HSBC World Match Play Championship at Wentworth Golf Club, UK.

In the past few years, Michael has been focusing on sharing his joy and love of golf at the Michael Campbell Golf Academy at Villa Padierna in the South of Spain using the game to teach junior participants to value persistence, strive for achievement and to remain resilient throughout their lifetimes. In parallel, he has been getting his game in shape for a fully-fledged comeback on the senior circuit. He turned 50 on 23 February 2019 and kick-started the second chapter of his life in May, competing again at tournament level.
